

(A continuation of Dr. Ray Emland's study of frog relics)

It has been centuries since the Norman Comet Shower of the year 2081. After the Earth was covered in colossal ice balls carrying carbon monoxide and ammonia, 90% of the human population ceased to exist. As the comets began to melt into Earth, swamplands and other wetlands covered a majority of the Earth's surface.

Humans began living in these swamps, a place with an abundance of life. More importantly, it spanned most of the Earth, creating a rich world of plants and animals. Technology felt like it never existed.

At some point, the Nepalese people of Nepal, a group of humans who began to devote their lives to worshipping frogs, started spreading their teachings in the year 3102. Frogs were seen as divine creations. Specifically, in the swamps of America, the psychedelic toad venom Bufotenine became the most popular drug on the market. Toad lickers were abundant around the world as well.

Many humans began to keep frogs as pets, both to worship them and to use their toxins to get high. With the domestication of the frogs, they began to develop a high consciousness and were able to bond with humans. Frogs began to be kept in homes and enclosures. Even with the limited amount of resources after the Normal Comet Shower, humans developed enclosures and even furniture for frogs.

I have come to the wetlands of California to study the cultures of the humans who devoted themselves to frogs. Attached to this journal letter is an old model of a frog couch better known as the “Frouch.” In the same area, I have found many other relics and I will continue to document more in the future.
